One of the areas that must be considered in the review of the Great Lakes Basin project is whether or not the existing service is adequate. Merriam Webster defines adequate as "a quality that is acceptable by not better than acceptable." By all standards the existing rail service in Chicagoland is adequate is it was not this project would have been proposed by on of the existing railroads. Instead, the existing railroads have fully supported the Create project, this support indicates they feel the existing services are adequate. Based on this the GLBT project must be denied as not publically necessary.
